"Electric City Workcamp"

The Area

The city of Scranton is at a crossroads. It is a vibrant community with a chic urban vibe. The downtown is alive with magnificent restaurants, cafes, coffee shops, and other small businesses, and the surrounding neighborhoods boast some of the most eye-catching historic homes you'll find in the state, maybe even the country.

Yet, the city itself is financially distressed, and living within its limits has become increasingly more expensive and riskier; taxpayers have been asked to shoulder more of the burdens and are choosing to flee to suburbs kinder to wallets. Due to the added financial stress of staying or buying in the city, more longtime homeowners of modest income cannot afford to hire help to keep up with their homes, and many, given the aging population, do not have the ability to do the work themselves. Neighborhood pride and morale are heading toward perhaps an all-time low.

Folks here know in their hearts that Scranton is a great place to live and can return to its heyday, but they also can use more reason to believe.

The pick-me-up provided by an army of Workcamp participants brightens neighborhoods and adds a far-reaching impact that lasts for years to come.

The Need

Years of New England winters can take a toll on homes and homeowners alike. Sprucing up exterior paint, building ramps, or fixing porches are a great way to show love to the Scranton city. Light repairs to interior spaces are also planned for many of the residents during Workcamp week.
